MANA-Member Murray Percival Company Marks 60th Anniversary

What Customers Want to Know About Salespeople Before They Buy

Keeping the Focus on Objections

Rick Root (r) and Kevin Jones Head Frontline Sales & Marketing
Customers
Like Life-Long Partners

BY JOHN TSCHOHL

Over the years I have had some real “wow” experiences with businesses — people and employees that have treated me like a VIP every single time I have come in contact with them. Sad to say, the opposite is also true.

It seems that every time I have a great experience, there are numerous bad ones that make me wonder why some companies are still in business. Why anyone would ever consider going back to make another purchase. No courtesy, no warmth, no one cares, no speed, no follow-up, and no respect.

Why Is Loyalty so Important?
According to global management consulting firm, Bain and Company, repeat customers spend 67 percent more than new customers. This is due to both larger transactions and more frequent shopping. Even a five percent increase in retention can lead to a rise in profits of as much as 25-100 percent.

You need to ensure that you continuously offer value to your customers to keep them coming back for more.

We see our customers as invited guests to a party, and we are the hosts. It’s our job every day to make every important aspect of the customer experience a little bit better. — Jeff Bezos, Amazon
Delivering more service than customers expect is a subtle competitive tactic.

My Five "Great Truths" About Quality Service

1. Treat customers like lifelong partners.
   Do it by listening to customers' expressions of needs and wants. Then help them obtain the service or product that serves those needs and wants best whether they're in your inventory or not. This is the proper procedure when you expect customers to return again and again over a long period. A customer is the most important visitor on our premises.

   "We are not doing him a favor by serving him. He is doing us a favor by giving us an opportunity to do so." — Mahatma Gandhi

2. Do not disappoint or anger customers.
   "Dealing with people is probably the biggest problem you face, especially if you are in business. Yes, and that is also true if you are a homemaker, architect or engineer." — Dale Carnegie

3. See the business through customer eyes.
   Call it "empathy." At T.G.I. Friday, a chain of bistro-type restaurants, the corporation familiarizes employees with customer perceptions with reports from mystery shoppers who routinely check out store image, merchandise and service from the customer point of view. Empathy is an important ingredient in the service business. How one handles a service problem is as important to customers as the solution of the problem itself.

   "Make your product easier to buy than your competition, or you will find your customers buying from them, not you." — Mark Cuban

4. Deliver more service than you promise or than customers expect.
   This is a wonderful way to build customer loyalty upon their feeling that they got a "good deal." Practice the "and then some" principle. Your products do all you say they will — and then some. Service is prompt, reliable and courteous — and then some. If a customer needs help once a sale is complete, help the customer — and then some. Delivering more service than customers expect is a subtle competitive tactic that competitors usually do not notice. In the process of building volume you can confuse your competitors. They will not understand how you are doing it.

   "Here is a simple but powerful rule: always give people more than what they expect to get." — Nelson Boswell

5. Try to get better.
   Imagine a mental fluorescent sign that flashes the questions, "How are we doing?" (Fine, but we can improve.) And, "How can we get better?" (Apply the answers as if they were an action agenda.)

MANA welcomes your comments on this article. Write to us at mana@manaonline.org.

"People respond in accordance to how you treat them." — Nelson Mandela

John Tschohl is an international service strategist and speaker. He is founder and president of the Service Quality Institute in Minneapolis, Minnesota, with operations in more than 40 countries. The Service Quality Institute (www.customer-service.com) has developed more than 26 customer service training programs that have been distributed and presented throughout the world. Tschohl's monthly strategic newsletter is available online at no charge. He can also be reached via Facebook, LinkedIn and Twitter.

Not a member of MANA? Visit MANAonline.org to find out more.

48 | AGENCY SALES | JUNE 2020